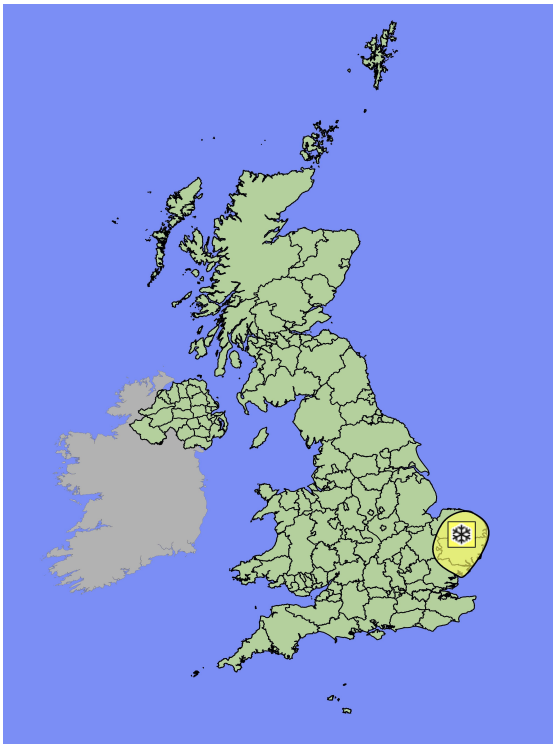
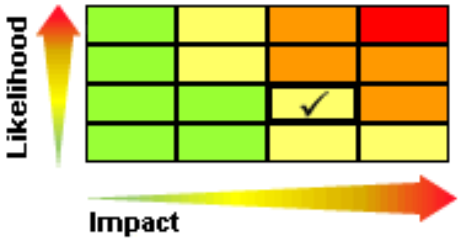
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
Showers are already moving south into Norfolk and some of these will affect other parts of East Anglia into the evening. However, the main concern is for a band of heavier showers which will follow south during the mid to late evening, turning to snow in the highlighted area, before easing and clearing south in the early hours of Tuesday. Although many places will only have 1-2 cm of fresh snowfall, a few places, notably in Norfolk and Suffolk, may see 5 cm accumulate fairly quickly.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Snow

Valid from 20:00 on Mon, 06th Feb 2012 until 02:00 on Tue, 07th Feb 2012

Showers of sleet and snow will become more widespread and heavier for a time later on Monday evening and into the early hours of Tuesday and are likely to give some fresh accumulations of snow. Generally 1 to 2 cm is likely, but 5 cm of snow may fall locally, and within a couple of hours. The public should continue to be aware of the risk of disruption to travel.
